WORKING PAPER

Strategic Substitution in Directed Networks (Job Market Paper)

We explore private public good provision in a directed network to which agents are harmed by actions of incoming neighbours. We discuss specific core-periphery network properties in relation to interdependence and Nash action by agents. For utilitarian welfare, we find neutrality of intervention policies that create or reduce frictions. Policies that provide subsidies to spillover on the other hand, raises welfare. Aggregating these results leaves us with the conclusion that there exist avenues for cost effective resource transfer policy. In the later part, we show significant relationship between a agents centrality measured by weaker negative externality and welfare improvement due to such subsidy.
