

Well played

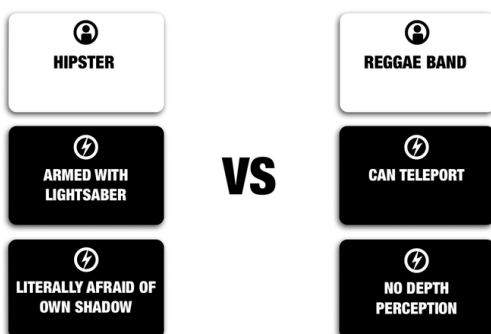

Recently, I was privileged to be able to attend a Games Club on twelve people Called 'Well Played'. With games designed to test your literary skills, in a fun way! It was a great opportunity to think creatively, without it feeling like you are being made to think really hard as to what to say, due to the games being fun and fast paced.

My personal favourite was a game called 'Awkward Game' where you had to pick a scenario and be asked by the group, questions about the scenario, and if they thought your answer was irrelevant or unacceptable, it would be down to a vote to decide if your out. See, Awkward!

Other games included 'Nano Fiction' a game where you randomly pick five cards that you don't know what's on them and make a story out of the cards you chose, It's Brilliant! Whilst testing your creative skills as well! And also 'SuperFight' where you choose a character and two abilities on a card, which could be good or bad! And use your debating skills to compete against other players, telling them why your character would beat its opponent, no matter how bad or good of a character you have.

The 'Well Played Games Club' was a prestigious opportunity to gain skills such as debating, thinking on the spot but also to have fun playing the games and would highly recommend the games to others!

The SuperFight Game

The Nano - Fiction Game